

It is already March! I guess it is about time to leave the nice heated carpet and venture outdoors, but it is still snowing.... Let's start with some happy news.

Happy News No.1

The other day, Popoki and Ronni found a wonderful e-mail from Noreen Croyle of Pro-ject PEACE in their in-box. Here's a bit of it:

"I'd like to inform you that for all of your wonderful efforts to promote awareness and discourse, especially amongst young people, about world peace, you have been recognized as an "Everyday Peacemaker" by Pro~ject Peace, a group endeavoring to project peace in our daily lives as well as worldwide."

↑ Please have a look at the Pro-ject PEACE website.

On behalf of Pro-ject Peace let me congratulate and thank you for all of your efforts to promote inner and outer peace in our global community.

Warm Regards,
Noreen A. Croyle

Happy News No.2

Popoki is busy in Hiroshima!

Popoki is on the ANT-Hiroshima website: http://www.ant-hiroshima.org/e\_ant.htm

You can see him introduced in Japanese at: <http://ant.blog.so-net.ne.jp/2008-02-08>

Popoki is also available at the Hiroshima Peace Memorial Museum. We just had an order for 30 additional books. People who visit the Museum from all over the world will have a chance to meet Popoki.

Happy News No.3

Popoki in Korean!

One of Popoki's friends, KIM SaeDuk, has taken him to Korea. Two Korean publishers have shown interest. If things go well, the Korean language version (Korean and English) of Popoki, What Color is Peace? should be available by the summer. Thank you, Kim-san!

Happy News No.4

Popoki has a new friend in Ronni's office!

Hello, my name is Café Latte (Latte for short). I was brought here by a human, Fumiko Tsuchiya. She is going to Tokyo soon, and I'll miss her, but she can always come back here. I'm a dog, but I don't dislike cats and I'm making friends with Pooh, the elephant and the other cats living in this office. I hope I can be friends with you, too.

Popoki in Canada (1/31-2/3)

Popoki gives a Keynote Speech at the University of Winnipeg

“Aboriginal Governance & Globalization Symposium” (By Satoko)

It was a global workshop, with many Aboriginal people participating. It was also Popoki's first time to address aboriginal governance issues.

It was also the first time for him to experience minus 50 degrees Centigrade, but he was not deterred!

Thanks to the strong support of Popoki's cheering committee ( Robin {Ronni's sister} and Professor Parvin Ghorayshi of University of Winnipeg), difficulties with technology were overcome. People who had been scattered around the room were drawn together both physically and spiritually by Popoki's story. At the end, it felt as if each person had Popoki sitting right beside them.

The talk was very successful. It not only encouraged participants to think about peace but also gave clear examples of the ways structural and direct violence are re-created. One example was showing a map that claimed to be of the Pacific, but in which many of the Pacific Islands were missing. Of course, we sold all the books we brought.

After the talk, many people gathered to talk about how to teach peace. In Canada,

English is used as a common language, but it is not necessarily everyone's first language. In keeping with that, one Aboriginal woman complimented Ronni on her English ability. When she learned I had come from Japan, she used her only word of Japanese: “Arigato!”

Every time I participate in a Popoki workshop, I can't help but feel that Popoki is planting seeds of happiness in everyone's heart.

In winter, Winnipeg, Manitoba (Canada) is a very cold place. This is a record of how Popoki dealt with the cold.

1 . Preparing for winter...

2 . Maybe just a muffler won't be warm enough...

3 . Minus 40 degrees centigrade. Popoki thought about this, and decided on a cloak.

(Everyone teased him about having gained weight...)

4. The first night he was given a sweatshirt from the University of Winnipeg. He tried it on immediately.

5. Home again in Kobe, Popoki immediately returned to his usual self!

But this year, it is cold in Kobe too....

Participating in the 13th Hyogo Foreign Residents Educational Research Council (Kengaikyo) Seminar

SANADA Yasuhiro

On 10 February, I participated along with Popoki in a seminar held by the Hyogo Foreign Residents Educational Research Council.

The seminar was held at Nagata Minami Elementary School in Kobe, just a short walk from JR Shin-Nagata Station. It was the first time I had been to an elementary school since graduating, but this school was built just like my old school so it felt as if nothing had changed. Popoki was stacked up on a table right near the entrance in the corner for book sales, waiting for new friends.

After the morning plenary, the meeting broke for lunch and people crowded around Popoki. Most of those who picked up the book to have a look were elementary school teachers. Popoki will probably find a place in the class library, ready to meet new young friends, and they will probably think about the color and sound and taste of peace.

By the end of the day, all 50 copies of Popoki had found new owners. Fantastic! It seems that Popoki has made a lot of new friends.

Lunchtime Workshop at Nada Ward Office

At lunchtime on 13 February, Popoki showed up at the Nada Ward Office. He did a workshop called “What does it mean to think about peace? Looking for ‘Peace’ with the cat Popoki” with about 60 members of the Nada Branch of the Kobe City Employees Union and Nada Ward Article 9 Society. It was his first time at a ward office, but everyone had a good time and became friends.

A “Workshop in a Workshop”?!?

TAMURA Kasumi

Do you think Japan is at peace now?
These are the people who positioned themselves near “Yes.”

On 19 February, I joined a faculty development workshop for about 40 faculty members at St. Thomas University in Hyogo Prefecture. Spending time with Popoki in a warm and relaxed atmosphere was nothing new for me, but this workshop held a big surprise. We spent the first part thinking about

‘peace’ with Popoki, but in the second half, Prof. Alexander revealed her teaching secrets, explaining, for example, what is important for ‘participatory’ learning, simple rules for teaching and what to do when you run into a problem. Using the same power point slides from the first part but with annotations, she provided an explanation of basic skills for facilitators including such things as how to structure time, and what to consider in making power point presentations. This allowed us to review the workshop while it was still fresh in our memories.

This gave us time to see objectively how the acilitator can guide the way participants feel and react during a workshop. There were many questions, and the workshop lasted about an hour longer than originally intended.

“Workshop” in a “Workshop” participants earnestly ask questions

What Popoki Means to Me

Thoughts on Popoki Day 2.21

Recently, I feel like green is the color of Popoki. Green is the color of nature. The color I can see even when my vision is bad. It is a comforting color; the color of growth; the color of life; the color of hope. It has been three years since Popoki died. Thanks to everyone, Popoki is happily bouncing all around the world. Popoki is in my heart, and everyone’s heart. I wonder, what is the color of thanks? (Ronni)
